

Special Child Study

The special child's study which follows concern the subject born on January 28 1955 at 22h00, Paris (75)

The aim of this Astroflash report, based on the work of eminent child psychologist J.P. Nicola, is to give an outline of your child's personality and character, and give both parents and teachers the insight which will enable them to encourage those natural qualities, to facilitate his/her success and to remedy whatever weaknesses he/she may have.

By taking appropriate action, teachers can not only counter his/her less desirable traits but turn them into advantages which will contribute to his/her social, intellectual and emotional fulfilment.

Example : A through a shy child cannot be made fearless, his/her timidity can be adapted into foresight and caution, qualities which could eventually be major assets for him/her.

Furthermore, if a youngster's natural aggressive instincts can be channelled and redirected rather than repressed, he/she may gain the drive he/she needs to succeed in life.

In short, this document should help parents to better understand their offspring, to see why they react the way they do and to influence their underlying psyche in such a way that their finest personality traits may flourish.

Please note : like any other astrological report, this Astroflash report is only valid if the child's exact hour of birth has been indicated.

This child's planetary type

In the general profile which follows, you'll find a broad description of your child's character with all its possible contradictions. This is in fact a back-drop on which his/her personality is formed. Don't be surprised by the strong words we may use in this portrait. They are necessary to describe a psychological type and show its dominant traits. Life itself invariably rounds off these sharp angles.

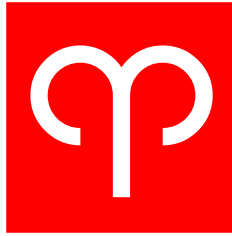

From the situation of stars at this child's birth, it would appear that there is a deep conflict in his nature. On one hand he has a clamouring hunger for affection and understanding, while on the other he has a need to assert himself and gain total independence. This makes for an interesting character who must be helped find a balance between his two contradictory bent. Technically speaking, he is simultaneously active and lazy.

Even his placid indolence has its good side--it means his aggressive streak is slumbering so that he can be his natural open-hearted and happy self. At such times he obeys, tries to please, does all in his power to captivate the grownups around him, and he's good at wheedling gifts, toys or favours from them.

He can also be temperamental, subject to brief fits of temper over a minor frustration, and aroused to indignant outbursts when he thinks he has been treated unfairly. He should not be allowed to make exaggerated demands or to get away with bad behaviour. Yet he must always feel that he is loved regardless of anything.

He undergoes sudden and abrupt changes, one moment passionately absorbed in something, the next yawning in boredom. Parents and teachers should try to understand his inner conflicts which make him torn between the desire to be strong, powerful, independent, first in everything--and his equally urgent need to be cherished, protected, looked after. Later his decisions may sometimes appear to have been made by flipping a coin as he seems to embrace one opinion as easily as its opposite when he is not emotionally committed.

His bounding energy should be channelled into an activity calling for drive and which gives him room to improvise, to act in his own way and in his own good time. Also he probably needs some private place of his own where nothing and nobody can disturb him. When fascinated by a project he can get through an incredible load of work, creatively operating in his own way and amazing others with the daring of his discoveries and experiments. At times appearing sleepily inattentive he can be galvanized into a formidable fighter who is ready to take up any challenge, set forth on reckless adventure. Despite his crusading spirit, though, this sensitive person will always remain emotionally susceptible to the opposite sex and very dependent on his affections.

Additional information concerning the psychological profile

The dominant sign of the zodiac may accentuate, deny or confirm some traits appearing in the general profile.

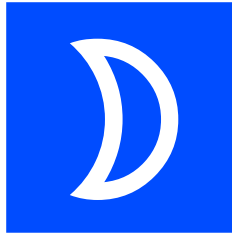

Here is how this sign affects the tendencies described above.

With Aries as a dominant this child will tend to be original, to the delight of those who know him. Even when quite small he has a sharp, incisive (though quite pleasant) way about him.

In behaviour he's often impatient of delay, seemingly always in a hurry to get on with the exciting business of living. He wants to dive right in without putting any tentative toes in the water, no matter what the others are doing.

His emotions will tend to be excessive-"too hot not to cool down" --with frequent ups and downs. He will get involved with many things and hardly lead a quiet life.

The need for complete independence and originality will appear on every-side--in his ideas, acts and feelings.

The innermost aspects of his/her personality

The following tendencies, which result from the Moon's position in his/her birth sign, apply to your child's emotions, his/her feelings and the way he/she reacts to his environment. This is a highly personal world, one which may change or appear quite different as the result of later events.

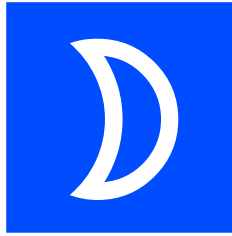

With the Moon in Aries, your child will tend to be sensitive, and subject to frequent fits of impetuosity and excess. This is not all bad, however, as all this energy may find an outlet in generous impulses and outgoing projects which may serve his will to dominate. On the other hand, this natural drive should not be wasted on dangerous experiments and adventures.

He will have particular trouble accepting the presence of rivals unless he finds in the person threatening to replace him an accomplice in his games or a playmate of the same character who loves confrontation and violence and joins with him in the many little tricks that children tend to play on their parents.

If you do not show him by example how to direct his energies along a single path, he may be inclined to instability, precociously exhibiting a need to change his surroundings, his friends and his occupations, carried away by a sort of impatience to swallow life whole.

In his relationships with family and friends, his horror of monotony will induce him to create excitement and unforgettable situations. His presence is overwhelming, and unless he becomes subdued by education, he will make himself remembered.

To such a strong and fiery personality, half-measures or mitigated feelings are out of the question. You might as well learn to love him as he is.

How their personality may develop

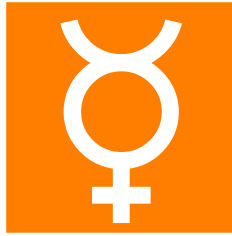

The phases of the Moon can also enrich or impoverish their relationship with their environment emotional life in a different fashion.

This child has a basic quota of aggressions that are liable to crop out whenever he feels the presence of a rival. Bristling with authority, he cannot accept any competition on his own terrain, even from his own family--and if he has a brother or two, his aggressions may disturb the tranquillity of the household. Make no mistake, however his jealousy is based upon pride and a spirit of conquest, and not upon the kind of sentimentality that comes from emotional starvation. He is simply inclined to believe that in order to assert himself, he needs a field of action wiped clean of all obstacles and competitors.

Unless he progresses beyond this stage of development, he can only satisfy himself by tests of force, sports and exploits which will enable him to gain glory through his insurmountable superiority. It would be a pity if in adulthood he became a braggart who obeyed only the law of the jungle--that the physically fittest survived.

The hopeful answer would consist in finding plenty of situations where there are neither victors nor vanquished and honour is satisfied on both sides. This may be accomplished by showering praise on him whenever he has solved a problem otherwise than by brute force. His pride needs gratifications.

An education which succeeds in channelling his aggressive drive into the social order will produce an adult who is competitive, yet devoted to his team, a person who wants to win fairly and squarely.

This child's intellectual aptitude of the subject

Mercury's position influences their intellectual tendencies, their understanding and interpretation of events quite independently of their environment's effects on their intelligence.

The influence of Mercury in Aquarius tends to favour creative faculties and emphasize the independent aspects of the child's personality. His mind is therefore characterized by a much greater desire to transcend conventional standards, and a need for personal affirmation which will mesh very neatly with a sincere search for justice. He will have sudden enthusiasms for causes and may be excessive in the defence of his convictions. He will certainly not lack energy, but may give offence through his often very partisan judgements.

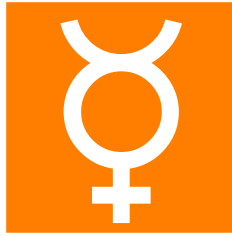

He will tend to be most attracted to fields which allow him to be in the thick of the fight, to lead a team and open up new paths, using his verve, energy and talent to the full. He will tend to carve out a niche for himself in fields where he considers there are freedoms to defend or win.

His assets = a spirit of discovery, openness to what is new and original, the courage of his convictions.

His liabilities = a tendency towards excessive judgements, with his originality tending to deteriorate into systematic anti-conformism, and a sterile spirit of contradiction.

Leisure activities, games = active games developing his sense of leadership and organization, technical and instructive games.

Sports = sports involving strength and speed. He may have a great need to work off excess energy

How their intellectual aptitudes may develop

The aspects of Mercury affirm or deny their basic tendencies by showing how their reactions to their environment may change the way their intelligence reveals itself, how they express themselves being another aspect of their mental processes.

His intelligence and sense of relationships can be used mainly in dealing with truths which cannot be defined by logic or other forms of precise measurement. More literary than scientific, the wanderings of his mind may sometimes appear bumbling. Though lacking any technical ability, he is nonetheless well suited to find poetic relationships between things and beings or to establish his own private form of language, a language made of images, suggestions and evocative approximations.

He may be enveloped in an aura of mystery or have trouble expressing himself clearly, easily and understandably. Anything he says will have to be guessed at. Unless he's weaned away from his habit of ambiguity, it will be hard to hold him to his commitments when he is an adult or to imagine what the consequences might be.

Extremely curious, he's at his very best when there is a secret to unearth, a code to decipher or some complex problem to be untangled. This sort of thing stimulates his intelligence. On the other hand, he may tend to get lost in useless complications in cases where the facts plainly speak for themselves.
